As the United States celebrated its 200th birthday in 1976, a remarkable project was underway to commemorate the nation's founding principles and share them with the world. The Bicentennial Abroad Declaration of Independence was a daring endeavor that embarked on a global journey, carrying a replica of the iconic document to over 80 countries.

A Diplomatic Milestone

The project was conceived by John Warner, a United States Senator from Virginia. Warner believed that sharing the Declaration of Independence abroad would foster greater understanding of American values and strengthen diplomatic ties. With the support of the State Department, the project was launched in 1974.

A special replica of the Declaration of Independence was created, housed in a protective case that included an English translation and a letter from President Gerald Ford. The replica was accompanied by a team of American diplomats and scholars, who traveled the world, meeting with foreign leaders, students, and citizens.

Inspiring Nations

The Bicentennial Abroad Declaration of Independence had a profound impact on the countries it visited. In countries struggling for independence or emerging from colonial rule, the document's message of self-determination and human rights resonated deeply. In nations with established democracies, the replica served as a reminder of the shared values that bound them to the United States.

In India, Prime Minister Indira Gandhi welcomed the delegation and expressed her admiration for the Declaration of Independence, stating that it was "a source of inspiration for all freedom-loving people." In South Africa, the replica was displayed at the University of the Witwatersrand, where it became a symbol of hope for the anti-apartheid movement.

A Global Legacy

The Bicentennial Abroad Declaration of Independence concluded its journey in 1977, having visited over 80 countries and touched countless lives. The project had a lasting impact, strengthening international relationships and fostering a greater appreciation for the founding principles of the United States.
