This achievement marked the beginning of a remarkable career that would span over two decades and cement his status as one of the greatest track and field athletes of his era.

Olympic Glory and World Records

Stevenson's Olympic journey continued at the 1908 Games in London, where he captured a silver medal in the 400-meter race, finishing just behind the legendary John Carpenter. In a thrilling race, Stevenson outspurred his rivals to claim the gold medal in the 400-meter event, becoming an Olympic champion at the age of 27.

Beyond his Olympic success, Stevenson also set several world records during his career. In 1909, he ran the 440-yard dash in 47.8 seconds, a record that stood for over a decade. He also set world records in the 220-yard dash and the 300-meter race, demonstrating his versatility and dominance in various sprint distances.

Versatility and Longevity

One of the most remarkable aspects of Stevenson's career was his versatility. In addition to his sprinting prowess, he also excelled in other track and field events. He was a skilled high jumper, clearing 6 feet 2 inches (1.88 meters), and a capable long jumper. His all-around athleticism made him a formidable competitor in both individual and team events.

Stevenson's longevity was equally impressive. He competed at a high level for over two decades, participating in four Olympic Games and countless other major competitions. His unwavering determination and exceptional fitness allowed him to maintain his peak performance well into his thirties.

Coaching Legacy

After retiring from competitive athletics, Stevenson dedicated himself to coaching and mentoring young athletes. He became the head coach of the track and field team at the University of California, Berkeley, where he guided countless student-athletes to success.

Under Stevenson's leadership, the Cal Bears track and field team achieved remarkable results. They won multiple conference championships and produced several Olympic medalists. Stevenson's coaching philosophy emphasized hard work, discipline, and a strong work ethic, principles that he had embodied throughout his own career.
